Subject: Disposal of waste lubricants at Seattle

Reviewing Stoel Rives latest invoice, where there are charges for the time spent discussing the Montana City drum storage, I was reminded of a conversation this week with Ken Rone.

Ken showed me plant waste in about a dozen 50 gallon barrels on pallets. Some contained the sausage shaped oil absorbers, others waste oil and others again contained water with a little bit of oil on top. Ken wondered about how to dispose of the waste without having to pay ~$300 per barrel. I told him that there are no Federal regulations that prohibit in-plant recycling of this type of waste and I proceeded to offer technical suggestions on how the wastes can beneficially be introduced into the process on a routine basis. I discussed possible state regulations with Nate and we agreed to start this form of disposal and show it to the state when convenient.

Please let me know if there are regulatory issues that I should have mentioned to Ken.
